Nelson The Two Brides
Dixie A Midnight Romance
Princess A Bachelor's Wife

As anticipated, the first bill of the week at the Hippodrome was a merry affair in which the affairs of three married couples were so badly mixed that they might be said to be scrambled. Dick Butler and Lew Mack were cast in Jewish and Irish characters respectively, and were better than they have been yet in character parts. Lew was actually Irish, and seemed to enjoy the part. Dick was a clever Jewish merchant and displayed good judgment in makeup and in portrayal of the part. It was characteristic, but not sickening, and that can not be said of most Jewish parts. Vi Shaffer and Marie Kruger were well cast as the two gossips who knew everything about everybody's husband but their own, and Billy Malone and Anna Cooke essayed to put them wise to their own husbands, and the fun was immense. As co-conspirators, Billy and Anna were both tied ad carter out a good scheme in a way that was productive of several laughs. The musical end of the evening was not as strong as on previous occasions. The opening was weak, as was the finale, the lack of pep being due perhaps to the rather slim attendance. Individual numbers were good. Vi Shaffer going back to her favorite style of song, rendering "The Doggone Blues" in a snappy manner. Lew Mack of course had to sing an Irish number, and selected "My Barney Lies Over the Ocean." Pretty Jacques Wilson sang "That Daddy O Mine" in a most delightful manner, finishing the number with a neat little dance which she was asked to repeat. Baby Doll Marie used "Will We Meet Again" and she did it well. Dick Butler took an old number "They Go Wild Simply Wild Over Me," and with a clever parody got a good hand on the number.

Beauty of Star Dominates.
The beauty of Lina Cavalleri at the Nelson today finds adequate expression in "The Two Brides," in marble and in the flesh, and no one who watches her graceful self revelation can doubt that Paramount has in this accomplished actress a tremendous resource for the future. It is hardly of the present, for she is yet to be given opportunity commensurate with her ability. The vehicle merely permits her to please the eye. The play that fails to interest of itself, to stand on its own merits as a dramatic composition, does anything but add to Cavalleri's reputation as a screen actress.

By way of illustration, there is built up in "The Two Brides" an idea that the beautiful daughter of a famous sculptor, also his model, adores her father and reverences his work. His last and crowning masterpiece, "The Island Goddess" exhausts him and causes his death. It is forever enshrined in her heart, yet she smashes it later on in a fit of temper, an impossible thing for a woman of fine ideals.

There are many other illogical developments in the story, and these, with an almost utter lack of suspense, reveal very limited constructive ability on the part of the author so far as screen presentation is concerned. There is compensation in the fine directing and in the selection of admirable exteriors and charming interiors, but these high value need a story measuring up to their quality.

Comedy, Drama and Serial.
Mary Miles Minter is the charming star in the Princess feature today, "A Bachelor's Wife." It is a five act comedy-drama, the American Film Company's latest offering, light hearted, yet with enough of the serious to make the story a likable one. Ruth Roland in "The Tiger's Trail" is the serial for today.

Second Day for Anita Stewart.
This marks the second day for the presentation of the Anita Stewart photodrama "A Midnight Romance" at the Dixie. "A Tugboat Romeo" is an added attraction.
